

Malini Nijagal is an obstetrician who provides care both at San Francisco General Hospital and UCSF. She spent her earlier career working in the County of Marin, where she led a system-wide redesign of maternity care services for publicly-insured women and founded and directed an outpatient OB/GYN program at a large multi-site FQHC, Marin Community Clinics. From 2014-2016, she completed a Health Management degree at the Harvard Chan School of Public Health, focusing on how to define and design high-value maternity care for individuals living on low incomes and facing inequitable care access, experience and outcomes. Since joining UCSF as faculty in 2017, Malini's non-clinical work has focused on using community engagement and partnership to design, implement and sustain new models of care that better meet the needs of those facing inequities, with a focus on models that allow for better coordination, collaboration and integration.
